

A Regal Residence

For Howard Solomon, his home truly is his castle

Driving on C.R. 665 in Hardee County, one passes herds of cows grazing in pastures, groves of citrus trees, and farmhouses situated on wide swaths of open land. The last thing one would expect to see in these parts is a castle. Castles belong in Europe, or at least in Orlando. But take a turn down Solomon Road and drive to the end, and sure enough there sits a castle.

Built by artist and author Howard Solomon, Solomon's Castle is a different breed from its European cousins. For starters, the gleaming silver exterior of this castle is made from discarded aluminum printing plates. There are no thrones, tapestries, or heraldic coats of arms inside, but rather an impressive collection of fanciful metal sculptures and wood carvings.

Yet it does have some typical castle accoutrements. There are towers and turrets and even a fierce-looking creature standing guard outside the castle. "We call him Igor the castle dragon," says Solomon of the eighteen-year-old, macaroni-and-cheese-loving iguana in a cage along the path to the entrance. Two suits of armor flanking the front door further add to the fortified feel; Solomon found them in a junk pile, restored them, and painted one black, one white.

Solomon has been building his castle in Ona, Florida, since 1972. Situated on ninety acres of land and open to the public for tours, it provides him with an unconventional place to showcase his equally unconventional creations. "I work with used materials," Solomon says. "My pieces are made of things people throw away." That includes oil drums, gas tanks, exhaust pipes, and bits from various machines and appliances.

Each room of the castle reveals the fruits of Solomon's wild imagination. There's a mounted grouper made from beer-can bottoms, a lion formed from five oil drums, and a number of pieces created during Solomon's "Brake Shoe Period." A metal helicopter hanging from the ceiling features a cockpit made from a peanut butter jar. Fifty pounds of wire coat hangers have been transformed into an animal menagerie, while hundreds of wood scraps and shavings were used to construct wall hangings depicting a Bahamian village and the city of Barcelona. Solomon's "gun" collection includes "weapons" made from a water-pump handle, toilet valve ("for flushing out the perpetrator"), and pipe wrench.

It's clear that Solomon has a great sense of humor, and he has a story and a joke at the ready for each of his pieces and displays. Of a chair made from eighty-six beer cans, he says, "I was trying to drink one hundred fifty cans, because I wanted a couch." He calls an alligator crafted from an oil drum Samsonite, because "his mother was luggage." In his living quarters, a camera collection exhibited on a windowsill is his "picture window." He classifies the area between his living room and kitchen "just a plain wall"; it's covered with an array of old wood planes.

The fantasy world continues outside the castle. The structure's eighty stained glass windows (also made by Solomon) represent everything from the solar system to nursery rhymes to the four seasons. A recently added lighthouse anchors one of the site's gift shops. And a replica Spanish galleon, complete with cannons made from irrigation pipes and a faux alligator lying nearby, serves as the Boat in the Moat Restaurant, run by Solomon's daughter, Alane. "The whole ship is made of recycled wood," says Solomon with a hint of a smile. "It used to be trees."

Solomon allows visitors to play king or queen for an evening by renting out a room in the castle. Called the Blue Moon Room, it goes for $125 a night. Alane and her husband are also in the process of constructing a bed-and-breakfast on site. When finished, it will offer six rooms, each decorated in a different theme. And in keeping with Solomon's practice of recycling and reusing, the inn's doors and windows came from a salvage yard in St. Petersburg.

Creatively, Solomon shows no signs of slowing down. His studio contains every tool imaginable, some of which, like an 1895 vice from Kansas City, Missouri, are older than he is. (The father of five and grandfather of three turns seventy-one in May.) A number of works in progress sit on tables or behind sheets, like his wooden recreations of paintings by Modigliani. (Recreating works by modern masters like Picasso and Calder is one of Solomon's newest endeavors.) "The ideas aren't any problem," he says. "It's the hours in a day, that's a problem."

Yet his castle has officially been on the market for about fifteen years (with a seven-figure asking price), and he says he'd willingly sell if given the opportunity. Luckily for interested visitors, no one has made any moves to purchase the property, though Solomon thinks it would make a great place for a medieval fair.

But in the meantime, he'll keep working and opening his home for tours, allowing others a glimpse into his unique world. "It's just the way I was born," he says of his urge to create. "I started making things when I was four. During the Depression, we didn't have a lot of toys. Kids made their own toys. So, I'm still making my own toys." ¶
